

which is more emotional than analytical."

The above statements contradict Paul's exhortations to learn and follow sound doctrine. As a result, one is faced with confusion and disorder riding the emotional waves of the aberrant teachings of the Vineyard movement.

Indeed, Wimber and his associates, with their emotional guidance system, have created a "monster" that they now find hard to control. Wimber's own life-threatening battle with cancer is a forceful illustration to the deficiency of his "power evangelism." One should not place trust in subjective and supernatural encounters. Such encounters are so often of the flesh or the devil. The Word of God is our final authority and the foundation for our walk with Him. Caution is a prerequisite when dealing with those who claim to represent Christ.

Jan. 25, 1996 Metro/State newspaper, the psychiatrist's therapy with Carlson sought "to recover repressed memories of participation in Satanic rituals and of sexual abuse by their families."

Among those testifying for Carlson were doctors, nurses, former patients and family members. The doctors felt that Humenansky should not be practicing medicine due to her method of treatment, which, they felt, did not meet accepted professional standards. Within her therapy, the psychiatrist suggested to patients that they had repressed memories of killing babies while involved with a cult.

At least eight other malpractice suits involving induced "memories" from other patients are pending against Humenansky.

VERDICT AGAINST CHRISTIAN SCIENTISTS UPHELD

The United States Supreme Court in January upheld a $1.5 million award against four Christian Scientists. The judgment stemmed from a lawsuit against the church members whose treatment of an 11-year-old diabetic boy consisted of prayer with no conventional medical care. The child, Ian Lundmann, died in May 1989 from complications of the diabetes, including intense vomiting and prolonged urination.

The wrongful-death lawsuit first was filed in 1991 by the boy's father, Douglass G. Lundmann. The four members of the Boston-based church named in the suit included Kathleen and William McKown, the boy's mother and her husband, and Mario Tosto and Quinna Lamb, Christian Science officials. The boy's father also sought a $9 million judgment against the church, but a Minnesota state appeals court had earlier thrown out the award. While upholding compensatory award, the federal justices refused to reinstate the larger judgment for punitive damages against the church.

The church members charged that as a consequence of the settlement they are being punished and forced to monetarily pay for religious thought and for practicing their religion. James Kaster, Lundmann's attorney, noted that the verdict says the clear understanding "that exclusive reliance on prayer treatment instead of medical care for a seriously ill child can give rise to ... liability."

In April 1990, the McKowns and Tosto had manslaughter charges against them dropped by a Minnesota court. The judge concluded that "no criminal proceedings would be brought regardless of result as long as they practiced their religion in good faith" and claimed that the state prosecutors had misread the law in bringing the charges. ## HOWARD-BROWNE PROMOTES A LENDING LIBRARY

A 16-page full-color insert in the January 1996 issue of Charisma magazine promotes the ministry of "Dr." Rodney M. Howard-Browne. The full-page supplement promotes the "laughing evangelist's" books and tapes, his upcoming winter and summer Campmeetings, and his "School of the Spirit," a five-week session of "intensive training."

Under product listings, he promotes his "Video Lending Library," the inspiration for which, he says, came from God.

"Early in 1995 the Lord spoke to me and instructed me to put together the Revival Ministries International 'Video Lending Library,'" Howard-Browne says in the ad. The "Library" is a set of 50 videotapes from his various Campmeetings and revivals "that have not been released to the public at large."

Howard-Browne has set a goal to place 100 libraries in every country of the world. How effective will his tapes be in non-English speaking countries? Howard-Browne says he has received "many first-hand reports of the Revival breaking out among groups of people who were watching an English version of the videos who did not understand a single word that was being spoken." As a result, he says, "The anointing knows no language barriers."

Howard-Browne is soliciting financial help for his project. A $350 gift will put a copy of his tapes in a foreign country of the donor's choice, or Howard-Browne's if the donor has no preference. Stateside, The Video Lending Library is available for $1,000.00 per set, the advertisement states.
